

- Object-oriented strategy selection operates through polymorphism applied to class objects, whereas functional programming strategy selection operates through higher-order functions and or pattern matching.
- Functions-as-values are naturally stateless compared to the stateful nature of objects-as-behaviors.
- Modules provide encapsulation and namespace management, allowing for modularity and clear function calling. Functors function similarly to templates, creating specialized, callable functions as needed.